

A dream kitchen, open to the space

When we think of a kitchen, it's usually an entire room that comes to mind. Filled to the brim with tall units, shelves, worktops, storage surfaces; every centimeter used and built up to the ceiling. A lot of effort when you consider that a kitchen basically only has two tasks to fulfill: Cooking and storage. It should offer space for this and make it as easy as possible. Ukrainian designer Vitaliy Ivakhov focuses on these basic functions and has developed a minimalist kitchen concept that combines the essence of cooking in a single, free-standing kitchen unit: Succinctly outlined, simple, easy to implement, but also flexibly adaptable to a wide variety of situations and needs - just like a good recipe!

Space miracle

the little kitchen dream is not called "Mriya" for nothing, as Mriya is the Ukrainian word for "dream". And the name and logo probably also borrow a little from the most famous "Mriya" - the longest and heaviest aircraft in the world, which was unfortunately destroyed by the Russian attack in 2022. But like the Antonov An-225, which once transported the Buran space shuttle, the kitchen block is also a marvel of construction and stowage art. It seems unbelievable what can be accommodated in its compact dimensions - and can therefore be reached with a single movement. Wine glass and lemon squeezer, spice shaker and potato box: Every item has its place, everything that is needed is there: "We clearly focus on the cooking itself - our kitchens are tailored to this task and are not limited by the geometry of the room," explains Ivakhov, who has been fine-tuning the perfect kitchen since 1996. The Mriya monobloc can now be simply placed in the room without a great deal of measuring effort - and just as easily taken away or replaced later.

Design variety

As standardized as the dimensions and modules may be, there is still plenty of design variety - thanks to coatings from ADLER: whether the kitchen is to come in elegant Pigmopur white or another color, in walnut veneer lacquered with Bluefin Terra-Diamond or in an elegant rosewood look(Arova Spritzbeize Kognak and Aduro Legnopur): The lacquers and stains that the manufacturer sources from its long-standing ADLER partner in the Ukraine - the dedicated Living Wood team led by Nadiia Rodionova - really get the dream kitchen off to a flying start!
